campaigns by running ads of three parties. We tried to find time and patience enuff to read the propoganda from all parties. But we confess we went along to the polling station with no clear notion of who stood for what. But we did, of course, know the candidate we liked, and for that candidate we voted — and we hope our normally-contrary missus did the same.

As of 10 to 12 noon today, 14 fellow villagers have devoted hours of their valuable time to analyzing for us, who have nothing else to do, the outcome of the election, both local and national, with reasons why "it went the way it did". We nod, and appear to agree, but the truth is that we do not have the political perspicacity to grasp such autopsies and postmortems. We do say, however, without fear of contradiction, that Russel
