It is of greater and more immed- ing to law. iate importance to him to know even the minor events that are occurring in his own This news he can not get in the city paper, the necessity for its supply is the cause of the existence of the country newspaper. To supply the news of the locality fully and fairly is the business of the country paper and if it does that it gives as good value for its cost as the city paper does, although the amount of news given and the importance of the events noted are not nearly so great. would be as unreasonable to ask from a country paper the quantity of reading mat-ter and news that is found in a city paper for the same price as it would be to expect nails to be made at the blacksmith shop as But a newspaper has to perform other work o hold opinions and to advance arguments in support of those opinions. Its opinions and arguments are expected to bear directly on the welfare of the locality in which it s published. In this department the greater value of the local paper to its locality as compared with the value of the city paper to the same locality can be clearly seen, No doubt if the city paper could be induced to advocate the interests of any single one of outlying towns in range of influence it could do more good than the local paper published there could. But that is not what the city paper is published for. It is expected to not be beaten by any one. I shall sell good

If the people of any locality want their interests to be pushed through the press it must be by papers divoted sole-ly to their interests—or in other words by papers which they support. The value of the country paper to its subscribers is not to be reckoned by a comparison of cost with city papers, but by considering whether it fulfills its mission of gathering local news and advocating local interests satisfactorily.

If the paper of an ordinary country town has a clearly defined and useful field in has a clearly defined and useful field in of nearly 3,000 references. Agents should drop which it gives value for its cost, much more so has the paper published in a pioneer town; one whose growth, if not its very ex istence, depends upon its being kept prominently and favorably before the public. inently and favorably before the public, at once for particulars to

It is far more than ordinarily important that its news should be chronicled in such shape that it will be widely read, understood and believed, and that its interests will be advocated with a single eye to its welfare and with all possible ability and vigor. The newspaper of a town is its outward manifestation. It is what those who have not seen the place will judge it by and will form their impressions of it from. If 15 00 it is bright, newsy and vigorous it will create a favorable impression and outsiders may size up the town and ccuntry as better than they look and will have confidence in them accordingly. So much as to the value of a newspaper to the community at large. Its value to subscribers need not be dwelt upon, as that is to a great extent self evident, Every per-1 00 son wants to hear the news.
