

Electron Data Radioed From Rockets Studied

Scientists have studied information radioed back from two Strongarm rockets.

Their aim is to find out more about electronic densities in the atmosphere through which some of the nation's mightiest military missiles will travel.

The latest efforts in a series of Strongarm rocket tests were not a complete success. Strongarm III, fired at 9:47 a.m. e.s.t., July 13, failed to achieve the height and 17,000 feet a second height and speed desired — 1,100 miles and 17,000 feet a second at burnout.

Strongarm IV, launched at 9:44 p.m. e.s.t., July 13, left the pad successfully, but its final height and speed were not determined immediately.

Both five-stage rockets plunged into the Atlantic Ocean.

Officials of the Army Ordnance Corps ballistic research laboratories and the National Aeronautics and Space Administration said the altitudes reached by the two rockets will not be known until all data has been analyzed.
