CHAPTER-VI.

The night before my wedding it was natural enough - ther restlessness upon me which w let me sleep, or think of sleep. When supper was over I bade vants retire. They had thou cracked, and with reason, I bell the way in which I had wandere the house all day, moving and and preparing, and giving order seeming purpose. I sat in my room, and, drawing the chair died in opposite his portrait, I strance conclave with (as I believ his ghost. I know now that if an communed with me that night my own evil angel.
