CR. A HAPPY MARRIAGE.

CHAPTER XXVII.-(Cortinued).

He was getting on the friendliest terms with Violet. He was almost as much at home with her as Rorie was, except that she never called him by his Chrislevely, mirth-provoking glances which he surprised sometimes on their way to dred small jokes and secrets that dated as intensely as it was possible for a nature radically good and generous to reduce her mother almost to penury by This was the success of the evening. That Rod. and by. erick was his rival, and was favored. were two ideas of which Lord Mallow could not dispossess himself, notwithstanding the established fact of Mr. Vawdrey's engagement to his cousin.

"A good many men begin life by being engaged to their cousins," reflected Lord Mallow. "A man's relations take It into their heads to keep an estate in the family, and he is forthwith set at his cousin like an unwilling terrier at a rat. I don't at all feel as if this young man were permanently disposed of, in spite of all their talk; and I'm very sure Miss Tempest likes him better than I should approve of were I the cousin."

While he loitered over his second cup of coffee, with the ducal card of invi- luctantly at the last, to let Lord Mallow tation in his hand, it seemed to him a accompany her in her visits among the ess, approvingly; and then she glided
