A despatch from London, England, prisoner charged with stealing 50 Canadian cheese, valued at £150, asserted that when Canadian cheese deteriorated in quality it would be impossible to identify them, but when they left the docks in perfect condition the witness would be able to identify them apart from the marks on the cases. He went by the smell and taste. It was a common practice for merchants to put inferior cheese into boxes with wellknown brands. People who expected to buy Canadian cheese were anxious to get it, but whether they got it was another question.
