Prince Made Him Rich With 300 Rubles and Stuffed the Notes in His Boots.

It was at the Czar's coronation in Moscow that Dmitri the water carrier encountered the drama of his life. The story has not been published, for in Russia it is not permitted to name living royal personages in such circumstances. Moreover Dmitri's madness from the sudden possession of riches would not be a very surprising thing to his countrymen, accustomed to the mind of the peasant, writes a St. Petersburg correspondent.

Moscow is a city of palaces, but most of them are too wanting in modern comfort to be used lodgings by distinguished guests. Some hundred foreign royalties were in the old capital together by the Czar's invitation to see him crowned. Most had to be boarded out among the families of officers of the court.

Among these were the sister of the Czar's bride and her husband, Prince Henry of Prussia, who stayed in the residence, near the little Moscow river, of a Colonel in the Czar's suite. From his window Prince Henry became interested in the regular early morning proceedings of Dmitri the water carrier.

Moscow a very small supply of running water and engineering had then done nothing to increase it. Vodovos, or water contractors, furnished each house with its daily rations, after

He obeyed dumbly and was ushered into the presence of an amiable man not much older than himself and apparently about as much embarrassed.

into the youth's hand. Dmitri stood amazed, staring at the money and uttering never a word. Prince Henry nodded cheerfully and I bade him go.

Clutching the notes in his fist Dmitr. made his way blindly back to his cart by the river side. He sat on the shaft and tried to realize what it all meant.

Nobody in his position, he reflected, could have so much money he knew how. unless he were a thief. His pay was six rubles ($3) a month with a shakedown to sleep on in the stable. Windfalls do not happen to moujiks, for the class compartments of life in Russia are too firmly fixed by law to allow the posibility of a rich relation. As he hugged the reality of his fortune, which made him a richer man than anybody in his village, fear seized him.

For a week he lay in prison until a statement came from his employer that Dmitri had disappeared leaving the horse and cart in the public road. The water contractor could suggest no explanation of the 300 rubles. Dmitri protested that they were given him by a Velizi Knianwhy, he did not know. By this time Prince Henry and his wife had returned to Germany.

Dmitri persisted in his story and a fortnight later the owners of the Prince's lodging were traced. They in their turn attesed that Prince Henry had sent for the water carrier, among other attendants, the day he left. They telegraphed to him explaining young Dmitri's disastrous story.

The answer came from the Prince affirming his tip of 300 rubles and asking that the notes be honored and paid over to Dmitri. Among the local coronation pardons was one to the water carrier for quitting his post without notice.

A gold chain and locket which were lost in Buckingham, England, a few days ago were recovered in a singular manner.

On Thursday morning, after a prolonged search, what seemed to be the hain and locket were seen hanging upon a telephone wire. ladder was obtained, and as there was nothing to rest it against some men held it in a perpendicular position while the lady's husband ascended and unwound the chain from the wire. The "find" proved to be the lost treasure.

The theory is that the articles were picked up by a jackdaw which alighted on the telephone wire and that the wind caused the chain to swing until it became wound round the wire.
