How the Nightingale Lost Its Once Brilliant Plumage.

Long, long ago, thousands of years nightingales wore the most splendid plumage of any bird. As they were also the sweetest singers, as now, you may imagine that none was their superior in the bird world. Of course the nightingales were very proud. This was natural. One young fellow, however, became so vain as to be almost unbearable. "Who is so fine a singer as I? Who has so handsome a dress as I?" This was the burden of his song day after

But the time came when the young nightingale warbled no more in the moonlight. A fairy, tired of listening to his boasting, came to him. "Idle braggart," said she, night will you cease your trilling. Hereafter you will sing and sing and sing, but not the notes of the nightingale. And your relations will wear a less brilliant garb from this time." All at once the nightingale became a little brook. The brooks, which heretofore were silent, now murmured softly and musically, but the vain nightingale no longer burst into glorious melody of song. As for the other nightingales, although they continued to sing as sweetly as ever, their plumage became a modest reddish brown color instead of having its former radiant hues. So were they punished.
