WAR CLOUDS LOOM IN THE ORIENT

Russia and Japan Acting Together in Placing Troops in Manchuria, Ostensibly to Fight Plague. Pekin, Feb. 21.—Although China had yielded to Russia in the international controversy over violations of the commercial and territorial rights treaty of 1881, war clouds still hung over the Orient to-day. Both Russia and Japan are moving troops upon the Manchurian frontiers. Russia and Japan are carrying out a pre-arranged plan, arranged through an exchange of notes between Tokio and St. Petersburg, it is charged here. Both advance the ground that more soldiers are needed to cope with the bubonic plague in Manchuria. It is this which has aroused China to the greatest activity yet shown in combatting the plague. It seeks to remove as quickly as possible the grounds for Russia and Japanese contention for more soldiers in Manchuria. The Chinese viceroy to Manchuria has been given greater powers than he has yet had in stamping out the scourge. While Japanese troops are being transported westward from Korea over Japanese railroads, the Russian soldiers, enroute eastward from Russian Turkestan, are making slow progress owing to the condition of the roads. Chinese soldiers are being mobilized in Manchuria, but this is not expected to presage anything further than perhaps a demonstration. China believes that Russia and Japan have a secret understanding to strip from her a large part of her territory. Russia recently raised the point that China had violated clauses of a certain commercial treaty, and prepared for a military demonstration on the frontier. The warlike attitude of Russia brought from China a conciliatory, but not altogether satisfactory reply, in view of which the Czar's government continued its preparations for mobilizing a large body of troops on the Manchurian border.
