SHAKESPEARE.

We have no doubt that the majority of those who were fortunate enough to be present at the play of Macbeth the other evening were somewhat surprised at the number of familiar sayings that were uttered by the players, and which have become imbedded in the everyday speech of our language. The size and quality of the audience is only another proof that the immortal bard has lost none of his hold on the reading and thinking portion of the community.

The trumpeter came out with his first call precisely at 8 o'clock, and it was not long before everything was in full swing. It no doubt was a surprise to most of the audience to find that it was eleven o'clock when the curtain fell. There is no doubt but that Shakespear had an end in view in writing each one of his plays. They were not written for the rabble, or with the idea of bringing out any particular star or set of stars. The beauty of all the plays is that each part, no matter how small, can be made of sufficient importance to impress the playing of the actor on the audience. For instance, in Macbeth, the porter had very little to say, but the little was well said and well acted, and this is one feature that keeps Shakespear's plays so solid in the minds and hearts of his countrymen.

The greater feature, of course, is the depth of thought, the understanding of human nature in the truest sense, and the inimitable common sense displayed by the author in all his works. In Macbeth we can trace the evil throughout the whole play—at first merely a thought flitting through the mind of the principal characters, then the speech, and then the act or acts, each gaining with accelerating force as one evil act is added on to another, until it would seem to be impossible for either Macbeth or his wife to do anything else but evil. How true to nature this is! Those of us who have any experience with the frailties of human life know that that is exactly how every evil works out, unless checked right in the bud. As one of the greatest of writers has said, law is made for the evil, not for the good. The good need no law because naturally they follow the golden rule throughout their lives, but the evil require checking by the law at every step. Shakespear understood this clearly.

In placing before the public those plays as they were played in Shakespear's day nothing is detracted from them. We very much doubt if there are any other set of plays that would bear to be shown of all the stage settings, and yet it must have been something worth seeing to see a play like Macbeth played as it was the other night, but with a setting such as Irving and Terry would give it. We rather imagine that Shakespear has been studied up this past week more than ever before, but if the study is dropped now, we shall be very much surprised as well as disappointed. The very fact of the saying, such as "Throw the phobic to the dogs," "Stand not on the order of your going," "In the sea and yellow," and many others, all used in everyday conversation, being in Macbeth ought to be an incentive to the boys and girls at least to read their Shakespear, for they will find all through his works many such familiar phrases. It is an education in itself to know our language and its works and we can only know it by study.

EDITORIAL NOTES.

A tabulated statement says the total loss caused by the miners' great strike in 1902 amounted to $140,572,600. This, however, does not include the loss to consumers. Those of us who had to pay $15 for a ton of coal also lost a considerable amount of money.

Kingston medical students have attained an unenviable notoriety for bumpiness, and unless the professional societies take control in a very decided manner there will be danger of the impression gaining ground that the ruder element of the students runs the institution. A while ago the University was made ridiculous by the newspaper reports of what the students intended to do in regard to students who were suspected of giving information against a ghost who robbed graves. They would not allow him to write at examinations, would force his expulsion, etc. Well, the ghost was punished. Now some hazing row has led to a police court case, and information is sent abroad that the students have decided to attend classes with him (the complainant). Some of the professors are in favor of expelling him from college, and it is probable that this course will be pursued, etc. Is there any control at the Kingston Medical College, or don't the things tend to a very low public estimate of their common sense?

English Princess Deplores Marriage of Princess Ena to Spanish King. At Christ church, Westminster road, London, at both services on a recent Sunday, the Rev. E. B. Meyer said that it was laid on his heart to make a public protest against the approaching marriage of the Princess Ena with the King of Spain, involving as it did her reception into the Roman Catholic church. The pressure of the election had diverted the attention of the country from this unfortunate alliance of the young English Princess with the son of one of the most bigoted Roman Catholic royal houses. It was greatly to be regretted, even though the marriage did not affect the line of succession, and was, therefore, largely a private matter for the King to decide, yet it was an approach toward Catholicism which was unworthy of the Protestant traditions of the English nation, hurtful as an example to society, and a deplorable sacrifice of principle for the Princess herself.

She had been failing for the last twelve months and became helpless as a child before the end. She was born on the 14th day of April, 1820, in the township of Hamilton, near Cobourg, and moved with her father's family when young to Oshawa, near Milton, where she was married to Mr. Galloway and went north with him. On Feb. 7th her body was laid to rest in Kinnmount cemetery, in the afternoon at about the same hour that she was married 63 years before. She leaves one daughter, Mrs. S.
