Inevitable Poultry Losses.

Beginners in poultry-rearing are often discouraged by the losses which they sustain. They find themgives unable to rear all of the chickens hatched and they discover that some folws die. But they should not be discouraged, because such is the common experience.

It is difficult to understand why, out of a broad of chickens all apperently of the same vigor, some will live and thrive and some will But such is a fact. There is probably a difference of constitutional vigor, though no difference is apparent. The student of nature knows that there is going on an endless conflict, by means of which the weaker specimens are eliminated and only the stronger survive. Through mis conflict, with the enormous lesses entailed, nature keeps up a tandard of constitutional vigor and above the criticism of a capable, prevents the deterioration that otherwise would ensue. Even when the fortering care of man intervenes, and master. Truthful, loving, kind, this conflict does not wholly cease. thoughtful for her family, as also Man may reduce the severity of the struggle, but he cannot wholly prevent it. If he could, the average vigor of the plants and animals unde his care would deteriorate. A friend of the writer, at one time an extensive breeder of Indian Games, used to say that his practice was to turn his hens and chickens into a large enclosure and let nature weed out the weaklings. If a chicken was not strong enough to survive, he was glad to have it die. His stock had a reputation for strength of coast tation and hardiness that made

Even the chickens which arrive at naturity will dfifer in strength of constitution. At moulting-time, when the growth of new feathers makes a great draft upon the strength of the fowl, natural selection weeds out some of the weakest fowls. It is not strange that some should die at this time. A large breeder of Light Brahmas used to offer at reduced prices many fowis for sale just before they moulted. He was led to do this because he found that it paid. Some of the lowis would not be so finely marked after they had moulted, and some of them would die during the process. But after the moult had taken place, he put up his price

Of course much can be done to prevent the loss of chickens and fowls by special care, and by the use of food adapted to their special needs. But after all has been done which human skill can do, it is well to remember that some losses will occur. Fortunat ly the p reentage of losses need not be large. If the percentage of losses is large, it is evidence ant something is radically wrong. The breeding stock may be lacking brigor, or the care and food may # deficient. When large losses ocor, the breeder should seek to ascertain the cause and to prevent the fature occurrence of such losses. But when the percentage of losses in chickens is not above 10 or 15 family is expected to be punctual. per cent., and in fowls is not above If they are not, the meal is eaten 5 per cent., there is no cause for special anxiety. The practice of killing off old lowls just before they moult, in view for tardiness prevents the delinquent of the fact of the possibility of the loss of some of them during the process, and the fact that during moulting they cease to be profitable, is financially commendable. By so doing, food and labor are saved, and the number of marketable fowls is larger than it would be after moulting. Room, too, is secured for tha more perfect growth and development of the young stock. Except in the case of a very few especially valuable breeding or exhibition fowls, which of course the breeder will desire to retain, it ordinarily pays to kill the old stock before moulting. There may be cases where, by keeping the fowls, enough more can be obtained for them to pay to do this, but as a general rule, the one advised is the most profitable course. It what had been said has a moral, it would be something like this: Inevitable losses will occur; they need not be rackoned as discouragements but should be recognized as a necessary part of the debit side of the account in poultry-raising; they are not wholly bad, as they serve to Merve the constitutional vigor of the fowls by eliminating the weaker medimens; good management wil leep the percentage of losses down 10 a small figure; some of them can e anticipated by the sale of the old stock before moulting.
