Ontario is moving March break into April to curb travel and the spread of COVID-19 — but as parts of the province get set to reopen, the government's own health advisers warn a third wave could soon hit unless stay-at-home orders are extended, vaccinations increased and transmission rates shrunk.

“The best bet we can offer from the science is this: If we're able to push the impact of COVID-19 down further by sticking to public health measures and aggressive vaccination, we can avoid a third wave and hope for late spring and summer that's
