Unconventional times require unconventional performance venues. In the case of the Food Source's annual live standup comedy show fundraiser, that meant switching from its usual location of The Academy Theatre stage and into the individual apartments of its performers, virtually.

By all accounts, last Wednesday's event was a success, despite the irregular circumstances, drawing almost 60 viewing households and earning about $1,200 profit for the local agency. Flato Developments and CIBC Lindsay also contributed to the cause, helping raise its final tally.

"Just the fact that we were able to make a profit through virtual means was really really exciting for us," says The Food Source's Kate Dorotheou who spearheaded
