our American institutions and an example of what perseverance will make of even the poorest boy is Frank A. Vanderlip, formerly assistant secretary of the United States treasury, who has just returned from a European trip to assume the vice presidency of a New York bank at a salary of $25,000 a year. This man of 35, before whom apparently stretches a reat future, is recalled by gray-haired residents of Aurora, Ill., as a barefoot, hungry-looking boy, whose childbood was spent in poverty and who had the compassion of the prosperous, As a mere lad he went to work in the railroad shops of his native town at wages amounting to $2 per week. The wretchedness of his own condition, as compared with the joys of those more fortunately situated, filled him with the determination to employ every energy in the making of his career. Twice each month, on department pay days, they were obliged to bring their savings accounts to the assistant secretary, to show that a portion of their wages had been placed on deposit and was drawing interest. In time two of these young men went to Harvard, three to Dartmouth and the remainder to minor institutions of learning.

Hated and Loved.

When he retired from his official connection with the treasury department at the commencement of the second McKinley administration, he was, perhaps, the most loved and the most hated man who ever held the place second to the secretary. He was denounced and praised. He was reviled and revered. He was guarded for cago. He sought it and became in a his withdrawal from office, as a testi-

was a sad breach of it in lower Broadway the other evening. A private brougham was being driven up the street from one of the downtown ferries just before the dinner hour. The horses were stylish and well kept, the carriage was spick and span, the coachman's livery was faultless; but, alas for the traditions of his post! The coachman was smoking assiduously, getting the greatest evident enjoyment out of a briar cutty-pipe. Who Owned the Dog ?

In order to test the ideas of children as to rights, the following story was told them: "Jamie's father gave him a dog, but Jamie forgot to feed it, and the dog cried often at the door. Then Jamie's father gave the dog to a kind uttle gir! who lived down the street. The children were asked: Who had the best right to the dog, the father, Jamie, or the little girl, and why? In anawering this question seventy per cent of the boys and fifty-seven per cent of the girls thought the little girl had the best right to the dog; forty-four per cent of the children thought, because Jamie had been so cruel in neglecting to feed the dog, he did not deserve it. This seems to weaken the theory commonly held that children are cruel by nature. About twenty-five per cent thought the father had the best right to the dog, saying that he had paid for the dog, and he was older and would take better care of it. About eight per cent said Jamie had the best right, because when a thing is given away you can't take it back again. It was principally the older children who took this last point of view.-Archie McDonald in Everybody's Magazine.
