Contract of the second It is not generally known, perhaps, that the United States army is just sempleting a map of every luch of the island of Cuba for use in case it ever becomes necessary for the American povernment to occupy the country by force. The engineer corps of the army has been devoting most of its attention to the undertaking since last fall, two of the three battailons having been at work on the island in the last half of that period. Not a nook or corner, not a traveled road or an obscure trail has escaped the mapmakers. The strange part of it is that the Cuban sysrement has aided the work in evmy way it could, giving orders to the rural guards and local officers in farway towns to facilitate the engineers' erations whenever possible.

> "Four little girls who never had seen a tree arrived at The Tribune hospital, in West Chicago, yesterday afternoon. They were sisters, and the youngest was a year old, the oldest was five. They had spent their lives in the Eighteenth ward. They never had been in a park; they never had been in the country. Only once in her life had Mamie, the elder, been farther than two black from her home, and that was one day when she was sent to buy a loaf of bread at the corner store, and, impelled by curiosity, walked as far as Halsted street to see the fire engines. "An hour after Mamie arrived at the hospital she had asked the nurse to write a letter to her mother. Mamie dictated the letter, and this is what the nurse wrote:

"'Mama: they is the biggest flowers out here I ever saw. They is as big as the whole house. Miss Jennings says they sin't flowers, that the're trees. But she is wrong. They is flowers, because they look like the flowers in the window, but hasn't the red blooms on them. I guess the blooms hasn't come yet. There is cows out here and horses and dogs and cats and chickens and ducks. Ducks is like chickens only fatter. Cows has things stickin' out from their heads like sticks. They has bells on them and they walk slow like Lizzie."
