Winston-Salem (N. C.) Experiment Brings Youth Into Civic Work

Training boys for the responsibilities of citizenship has been undertaken in Winston-Salem, N. C., along broad lines. The characteristics of the plan are co-operation between the public schools and the local board of trade. establishment of a department of government in the high ochool and formavenile club, as it is called, of the board

At the beginning of the last school year School Superintendent R. H. Latham began a course in government and economics, open to the senior students, and put the new department un-There may be some people who be der the direction of the secretary of elections were held and the class was successively organized as a city council, a general assembly and the congress of the United States.

As a result of this work the boys developed an active interest in public affairs. To hold this interest it was suggested that there be organized a juvenile club of the board of trade. Membership in the club is not limited to high school boys, for it was thought best to open to all interested boys of the city a way to become identified with constructive civic work.

The boys have the privilege of attending regular meetings of the board of trade, with the right to take part in debates, but without voting power. Committee work is assigned them, and special meetings are held for them twice a month or more frequently if the work demands.

The first employment of members of the juvenile club was in the recent industrial survey of Winston-Salem conducted by the board of trade. In this work the boys visited local manufacturing establishments and filled out a detailed schedule in the same manner as do special agents of the statistical bureaus of the federal government. They were held responsible for the accuracy of their reports, and sta-
