One Way to Get a Pass. "Madam, if I didn't know I would tell you," said the polite commanding general to the lady asking for information to which she was not entitled.

The important thing in military censorship is to know just where and when to draw the line. In our Civil war the colonel of a Pennsylvania regiment went to Secretary Stanton to ask for a pass for an old man to visit his dying son after a battle.

The pass was gruffly refused. Whereupon the applicant said to the secretary, "My name is Dought, colonel of the 149th regiment, Pennsylvania volunteers. You can dismiss me from the service if you like, but I am going to tell you here and now what I think of you," which the colonel proceeded to do in language not fit to print.

He got the pass.

THOSE OPEN-WINDOW CRANKS. Writer Gives It as His Opinion That They Are Actuated Solely by Selfishness.

One of the most pronounced annoyances with which seasoned travelers on railroad trains have to contend is the "open-window crank." This fellow—for he is usually a male instead of a female—persist in having his window open, no matter whether other occupants of the car dislike it or not; and it usually results in the other passengers thereabout receiving a liberal supply of dust and fine cinders, as well as enough soft coal smoke to last them the remainder of their lives.

These open-window cranks are almost always occasional travelers. It is noticed by those who have taken the pains to observe that the regular traveler—that is, the man who rides every day in summer—never opens the window beside the seat in which he is riding. It does not mean any more comfort for him to do so, as he long ago discovered, but much discomfort instead.

As soon as a railroad car starts to move there is more or less air stirring and if the open-window cranks would only compose themselves a few moments they would be far more comfortable than they could be breathing cold dust, smoke and cinders. But the average occasional traveler will push up his window as soon as he enters the car.

It makes no difference to him how much the rest of the car suffers—he is the only one to be considered. It is a practice that causes great discomfort to passengers who have the necessary sense to know that everybody is better off if the windows are closed on hot days. And it is always noticed that these open-window artists invariably leave the window open when they depart. The first, last and only thought is for themselves—no one else counts.

Reasons Slowly Unfolded. The answers to our impatient questioning of life's problems come but slowly. Today may show us what yesterday meant, but it is dumb about itself. We must do and bear as best we may, and always wait for tomorrow's answer to our clamorous "Why?"
