LUCKY SALLY

By GERTRUDE CUSHING.

"Wasn't Dorine glorious tonight? Oh! She made me feel as if I wanted to cry and cry for hours on end. Do you suppose I'll ever sing like that?" The speaker dropped her chin into her cupped hands and stared across the shabby little cafe with a gaze of almost tragic wistfulness.

A few blocks away the great opera house was once more a silent, darkened cavern. In her dressing room the prima donna whose "Butterfly" had moved eager hundreds to envy, sadness or admiration—as the case might be—was fretfully removing her make-up and thinking of the check in her handbag and the delayed dinner which would be ready in her apartment.

"'U bel di," hummed the girl in the little cafe. "Oh! do you think it will ever come to me?"

Her companion, a big, dark-eyed girl, set down a cup of viciously strong black coffee and gripped her fists tensely on the edge of the table. "Don't ever give it up. I never will. It's worth any struggle—any sacrifice."

A little old man sat opposite the two girls. He was sipping tea, munching a ham sandwich, and around the side of his newspaper regarded them with kindly quizzical eyes.

"I take it you're music students?" he advanced, courteously.

For the first time the girls became aware of his presence.

"The old man's face grew genial and encouraging. The girls responded: "Did you hear Dorine tonight? Wasn't she superb?"

"Madame Dorine is a very great artist. I know her. I have known her for a great many years. I have a fancy she would like you to hear her story. You particularly." He indicated the dark-eyed girl who had last spoken.

They bent forward glowing and expectant. Coffee and leers were forgotten.

"She was born in a small town out West, Sally Gerrish her name was—'Lucky Sally'—that's what they called her. It began when my brother sent her East to study singing. You see my niece and she were chums, almost inseparable, and there was money in our family while the Gerrishes were poor, at least too poor for that sort of thing.

"Well, they came on here, found a good teacher and settled down to hard work. They were as different as any two girls you ever saw. My niece was a quiet little thing. Took everything pretty sober and thought a long while before she made up her mind.

"At the end of a year they were both getting ahead fine, but my niece had taken up with a beau and she was doing a lot of thinking about more things than music. I never saw him, but I guess he was pretty handsome looking, and he was rich and sort of a swell. Well, about this time someone heard my niece taking her lessons, and he was crazy about her voice. He was looking for a soprano for his church, and he hunted her up and offered her the position.

"I don't know to this day the whole thing, but Crystal's young man had something to do with Sally's getting the church. She did get it, and the folks back home said again, 'Sally's luck, and did anyone ever see anything like it?"

"There's a lot of things you can't see right from a distance. My niece was the lucky one that time, though no one knew it. Her fine beau kinder drifted away from her, and the next thing we knew he and Sally sailed for Europe on the same steamer. My niece never talked much about it. She went home and she never came back to study. She kept on with her singing, and we all think in our town that there never was a voice quite so beautiful. She's married now to a tip-top man, and she's got a nice home and three children—splendid youngsters. The boy's named for me.

"Sally never went back home till last spring. She stayed over in Europe most of the time and the newspapers became her letters. We never heard much any other way. She kept her own counsel. The world knows her as a great singer. She's rich and she's generous to her people and back home they still call her 'Lucky Sally.' The man who led the two girls to the turning point of their lives lives in New York. He's married, too.

"Last spring when Madame Dorine went home she stayed three days, and most of the time she spent at my niece's playing with the children. She was there when the telegram came with an offer that took her post haste to Paris. My niece laughed when she read it. 'You'll always be Lucky Sally,' she said to her.

"Sally turned on her like a tigress, she says. 'Don't let those words ever cross your lips again. Lucky Sally! Oh! the mockery of it!' Those were just her words, and for some time she paced back and forth without speaking. Finally she got quiet and bade my niece good-by. At the door she turned and said: 'Crystal, you've got two things I'd give all I have in the world to own! Then she pointed to the plain ring on my niece's left hand and to the baby in his cradle.

"I guess perhaps that isn't just the kind of story you expected, but maybe some time it'll help you if you're ever at a crossroads. Good-night." The old man sipped his chilled tea, added his paper, and bowed himself from the cafe.
