Service That's Helpful
Dealers Aid Their Customers

BUYERS often do not consider the high quality service of retail dealers. This is true in all lines but especially so in building materials where the commodities are heavy and bulky and much of the service is not in sight.

So many things enter into lumber yard service—First there is the unloading, sorting and piling so that material may be in plain sight of buyers and yet well protected. This requires a lot of labor and supervision by trained men.

The retail lumber dealer and his employees must be informed as to grades, quality, just where to find everything in sheds and yard. They must be able to give reliable information that will help the customer. That is real service and its cost is considerable.

Another service is the delivery of building material. Putting the right thing on the building site just when they are needed so there may be no expense or trouble to the buyer in housing, protecting from the weather. If your lumber bill was dumped on the site promiscuously you would have trouble and expense in caring for it.

The real service yard gives you just what you need and when you need it.

Credit is another service. The local dealer generally "carries" the buyer until the building is completed. He does not get pay in advance, deliver the job and then wash his hands of the whole affair. He stays with you until the job is done. If the builder changes his plans the dealer exchanges lumber, gives just what you want and need.

All of this service costs money. An ordinary retail lumber dealer has from $30,000.00 to $75,000.00 invested. He must maintain and pay his men, feed the teams, buy supplies, whether business is good or bad. He must give a high type of service no matter what the cost.

"Overhead" that you hear about is service, capital invested, wages, taxes, insurance, contributions to various community enterprises and charities. This must all be paid for before the dealer can get a cent of profit for himself.

The price of lumber is down forty-five per cent below the peak last May. But there is no decrease in the "overhead" cost of service. Your dealer marks his prices down to keep pace with mill prices but he cannot mark down labor, taxes, insurance and other expenses.

Lumber Prices Are Lower but the service must remain first class regardless of cost.

Talk to us about your building problems. You know us and you know we can give you straight information. That's a part of the service we offer.
