HARRY CAREY

In the surprising adventures of a man who tried to find a father for a certain party.

"HEARTS UP"

Hey! Did you ever have an unknown and very pretty girl throw her arms round your neck and yell, "FATHER?" Folks say a man can get into a lot of trouble that way—but this man was kind-hearted and thought he'd let the poor little orphan go on believing it. What happened? Oh, NOTHING. Only more fights and trouble than you could shake a stick at. Come see this picture and have a good time.

Mabel Julienne Scott

in
"Behold My Wife"

"LO! THE POOR INDIAN!"

By Violet Moore Higgins.
Mabel Julienne Scott, playing the heroine in George Melford's production of "Behold My Wife," a Paramount picture, adapted from Sir Gilbert Parker's novel, reveals in her costume the undeniable effect of the Indian and his ideas of art.
First, there's the unique fan of turkey feathers; the almost barbaric headwork on the gown; and last—the feather-covered train of a primitive savage princess.
Miss Scott plays the part of an Indian girl from the Hudson Bay Country, who is married to Frank Armour (Milton Sills), a young Englishman of good family. To humiliate them he sends his Indian wife to them in London. Her lot there would have been unbearable had it not been for the child that comes to her, and the friendship and help—and later the unspoken love—of her husband's crippled brother, Richard (Elliott Dexter), who educates her for her place in society and reunites her to her husband.

Gladys Walton

in
"Risky Business"

She did not know the man very well, but when she saw that he was making love to her sister her suspicions were aroused and she believed that he was not honorable. One day when he was talking with her sister at the edge of a pool of water she saw her advantage and before she knew it she had thrown him into it.

As he emerged he vowed vengeance. Did he get it? Well, we'll say he tried hard enough. This situation is only one of the many ludicrous happenings which appear in "Risky Business," the latest Universal production, starring Gladys Walton.
