Gas Lights Out

Announcing his visit with loud rapings on the sidewalk, the gas inspector would promptly turn off the gas at the street if his command of "Gas Lights Out!" was not obeyed. The occupants of the house would then resort to candles or oil lamps.

That is what happened in the old days, when gas was supplied to people by contract, to be used for lighting purposes from sunset to a certain hour at night.

Today, thanks to the invention of the gas meter, no such inconvenience exists.

An instrument of accurate measurement, durable and dependable, the meter permits gas to be used at any time, in any quantity desired, assuring our customers that they pay only for what they get, while we are assured of receiving payment only for what we supply.

Truthfully may it be said:

There is no commodity on earth dispensed to the public with greater justice to the buyer and seller than manufactured gas.
