Citizens seek to save 131-year-old church

The following story appeared in a recent edition of the Owen Sound Sun Times.

The same faith that moved a group of settlers near here to cut down cedar trees from the banks of the Saugeen and build a small log church is today motivating the same settlers' descendants to save this 131-year-old church from the ravages of time.

"It's a tribute to those whose faith made it possible, as well as to give thanks at the present time," said Beatrice Scott, one of two Port Elgin sisters who are involved with a committee of area residents repairing and rededicating the tiny Dunblane Presbyterian Church.

Beatrice and her sister, Jean, are the grandchildren of Robert Scott, who donated the land to the congregation in the late 1850s. Four generations of Scotts have attended the church, running down in the morning before the service to start the woodstove, and during the service, sitting in the back pew of the church that gave them a clear view across the fields to their home.

Services were always held in the afternoon at the Dunblane church, because the congregation was never large enough to warrant its own minister. About 20 families helped cut the logs for the church, and many of their descendants now take part in the once-yearly service held the first Sunday in August.

Regular services were given up in 1968 when the congregation just got too small to be able to pay the minister. At that time, about six families regularly attended the church.

"It dwindled down as people moved away," said Jean, explaining that at its height, a regular congregation of about 70 might be expected for Sunday services.

This fate was not uncommon for rural churches, as people started to move off the farm and into urban areas. The Scotts moved out of their late 19th century farmhouse and into Port Elgin when their father died.

Although the congregation's numbers had decreased, their belief in their church had not.

At the 1981 service, Rev. R. D. MacDonald told a stunned group that since the trustees of the church felt they could no longer look after the building, it had been recommended that no more services be held in the building that had been a house of worship for 130 years. The church needed extensive repairs and unless the money could be raised, the always-open doors would have to be shut for good.

"We felt it would be a shame to let it go," said Jean Scott, sitting in one of the hand-carved pews made for the church by her great-uncle years ago.

"It was very close to us," said Jean.

For the Scott sisters, the church is a link with their family and their religion that would be too strong to relinquish. Peter Scott, who carved the pews and the communion table for the church in the late 1800s, was also the first session clerk at the church, and just a few years ago, the Scott sisters' nephew, Rev. Dr. John Scott, celebrated his first communion and gave the anniversary service in the Dunblane pulpit.

Beatrice, who served as a missionary in India for 30 years, was designated at a service in the church she had attended all of her life.

Other families felt the same way. The Gowanlock family, who owned where the early congregation was lost a family member in the First World War who is remembered on a plaque honouring war dead in the church this month, a young Gowanlock who married at the church.

Other area residents have volunteered their services to the church, and they are pleased to point out a number of people, who have no past link with the church, have been interested in helping.

Although there is no full-time congregation members can be organized for a cleaning bee, and the small white clapboard building open for passers-by.

The church committee hopes a new roof for the church started last year and by next year's August service should be a rain-proof roof, repairs and a newly-decorated interior.

All the work is being financed by donations, and the Scotts have felt about the venture's success.

The church has slightly more attention than when built by a group anxious for a formal place, no matter how rough, in which to worship. But the church by the Saugeen River is a spare, unadorned building.

The original logs were covered with and clapboard sometime in the 1800s and inside wainscoting and walls were put up, and the pews, altar and tables painted. There are no stained glass windows, no new, glossy prayer books, no modern conveniences, like incense or electricity.

Outside there is little room for parking and the last concession made to modern transportation methods was a shed for horses early this century.

Jean and Beatrice remember their parents travelled to services by buggy and boat. They remember winter services when people came to church in sleighs, their coats, the oil lamps burning to light the service.

The committee looking after the church has no plans to install plumbing or electricity, and as much as possible want to keep the original flavour of the historic building. "You have to keep the atmosphere," said Jean.

The Dunblane church will likely again house regular Sunday worship. It has no woodstove, and although people are interested in the building, it's doubtful a congregation could be attracted. Jean and Beatrice hope the yearly services will continue and wonder if, as in the past, singing concerts or services could be held in the church.

The church has had a long history. It was founded by the small hamlet that bears its name. Dunblane, an enclave of Scottish settlers, was at one time a string of stores, a mill and a school. The school by school is still standing but not for its original purpose. The buildings have gone.

But for the Scotts and their fellow members, keeping the Dunblane church standing and open for worship is a commitment that has lasted 131 years and is likely to be broken today.
