ishoners at Navan until the Canadian Church called him west to be principal of St. George's Indian Residential School at Lytton, British Columbia.

This school was one of two founded by the New England Co., the school at Brantford, Ontario on the Muncey Reserve and the large agricultural school at Lytton, B.C. Because of Adam's agricultural experiences and his office in the church he was chosen from throughout the Dominion to the Principalship of St. George's in 1921.

He found the first school built at St. George's, on the banks of the Fraser River, a wooden frame building of English architecture, with a chapel of purple limestone nearby. Soon vast changes were on foot in the school room and on the farm. Plans were begun for the erection of the present solid brick school in 1923, removed a half mile from the old site, with the "Sleeping Beauty" in view. Only the chapel was dismantled and rebuilt, which today stands as a lasting memorial to the man who supervised the entire building. A small brass tablet on the wall of the sanctuary of the chapel informs the viewer of such.

During Adam's principalship the pupils of St. George's School led in many lines of training. The discipline of the school was unique in that rewards were presented for leadership at the Annual Sports Day in May. Those capable
