

GLENDALE SCHOOL

In all there were four school buildings. The first was log. The second was frame. The story goes that it was insulated with saw-dust. The saw-dust became wet and the building rotted out. The third was a one room white brick school heated with a pot bellied stove. There was a turn stile at the entrance, and a wood shed behind, Then a high board fence behind which were located the outside conveniences.

In 1945 a School Area was formed under whose direction the first unit of the present school was built costing $80,000.00. The old school was removed in the fall of 1949 as the new school was built in 1948. A west wing addition was built in 1955 at a cost of $40,000.00. The School area Board was disbanded in 1954. In 1960, the original school bell was re-erected and electrified and daily its sound rang forth calling the children to classes as it did many years ago. On January 1, 1961 Glendale School was annexed to the City of London and came under the jurisdiction of the London Board of Education. At this time there were nine class rooms.
