

HAVE Inherited much of his father's Tweed property. The Village of Tweed had been laid out by Mr. Jamieson in 1850, when he began to sell building lots. After his father's death James Coleman Jamieson continued to sell these lots. The grist and saw mills, also inherited from his father, were sold in 1870 to George Easterbrook.

James C. Jamieson married Louisa M. Bowell, a daughter of Mackenzie Bowell, later a Prime Minister of Canada. About 1875 he left Tweed for Belleville, where he was managing director for the Belleville Intelligencer. About 1896 he went to St. Paul, Minnesota, where he died in 1924, age 80, leaving two sons, James W. Jamieson and Mackenzie B. Jamieson. Another son, John, died of typhoid in 1892.

James Jamieson, Sr., also had a daughter, Lucy Coleman Jamieson, who married Rev. Jacob E. Howell. She was born in Belleville in 1841, and following Rev. Howell's death in 1903 she returned to Belleville and died there, leaving two sons, Dr. A. J. Howell, Michigan, and W. B. L. Howell, at that time principal of Port Arthur Collegiate Institute, also two daughters, Mrs. E. A. Edkins, Chicago, and Mrs. F. S. Deacon, Belleville.

This photograph of James Jamieson came from an old scrapbook started by Emir Dyer, whose father, Daniel Y. Dyer operated the old Tweed Woolen Mill before 1875. The Dyer and the Huyck families were related, and the scrapbook was sent to Tweed by C. B. Huyck of Vancouver. Emir Dyer married Richard T. Morton and went to Castleton, North Dakota. The photograph is inscribed on the back "Mr. Jamieson, died Nov. 16, 1865. Lucy Jamieson to Emir Dyer, September 14, 1867".
