

and take them home. It meant wading out into the swampy water to drive them out. Not knowing the depth in places made this work very dangerous. But anxious to save their cattle from a watery grave these men continued their round-up which often took them nearly to their necks.