When Nellie Montgomery suggested I take over the job of Curator there were some misgivings. However through a gradual process the job became a challenging and interesting one. You begin to clip out, take photos, and in the back of your mind you assess what could be incorporated into the Tweedsmuir.

From time to time there are workshops giving you more ideas and possible changes in the way things will be done in the future. For example, acid free paper and mylar are newer terms to curators. They preserve material better. We are encouraged to use these even though they will become more expensive to use. We may have to become more selective in what we chose to include in future books.

It has been such a worthwhile experience for me and wish the next curator the same enjoyment.
