

New Colborne Creek subdivision will have streets named after apples

Cramahe council OK's recognition for traditional varieties grown in area

Cramahe Township, which bills itself as being in the "heart of apple country," has perhaps not surprisingly voted to name streets in its new Colborne Creek subdivision after traditional apples grown in the area.

Council turned the sod for the 60-lot project on the 46-acre site Keeler lands north site on Division Street in Colborne Oct. 1.

The township purchased the property for $227,500 in May 2002. The purchase was funded from Cramahe's future capital and proceeds from the sale of the electrical component of the Colborne Public Utilities Commission to Lakefront Utility Services in Cobourg.

Colborne pharmacist Steve Bowskill and dentist Tovi Luong have been two of the driving forces behind the Colborne Creek project. The local builders for the project include Jim Mensen, Mike Voskamp, Bill and Jim Rutherford, Roger Cheer and John Kernaghan.

The recommendation to name the streets after apples came from Jim Lawrence of Lawrence Marketing & Communications in Wooler, who is under contract with the township to do public relations for the project.

In a letter to Trudy Merrill, the clerk of Cramahe, Mr. Lawrence says, "Clare Musselman (an appointed citizen member of the township's land division committee) and myself suggest the following names," and go onto recommend Baldwin Place, for the street closes to Ontario Street, and Cortland Crescent, for the crescent nearest Division Street.

Council approved the street-name proposal with little debate.

"Do they still have them?" was Mayor Lee Dekeyser's only question about Baldwin apples and naming a street after them.

Mr. Lawrence assured the mayor the apples, while rare in this area now, still exist.

Baldwin apples date from John Ball's orchard in Wilmington, Mass. in 1740. The original name was the Woodpecker apple because woodpeckers frequented the trees. The apple was eventually named after Col. Loammi Baldwin, who grew them later.

The Baldwin is a bright winter apple that in the years before refrigeration and the Second World War was immensely popular in the northeastern United States and Southern Ontario for baking apple pies and applesauce. They come out in late October usually.

The Baldwin has declined in popularity outside New England since the mid-1940s and has been supplanted by newer hybrids such as the McIntosh and the Cortland.

Cramahe presses ahead with subdivision plan

Developer estimates project manager could cost $85,000 to $100,000

by JOHN BARKER
The Independent

In the face of mounting costs, Cramahe Township council has voted unanimously to press ahead with an even larger Colborne Creek subdivision.

The subdivision is now to increase in size from 60 to 72 lots.

Colborne pharmacist Steve Bowskill, the driving force behind the project, and Becky Bonisteel, the township's chief building official, told council Nov. 16 Peterborough consulting engineering firm D.M. Wills Associates Ltd. has done $66,300 worth of work on the project - all without a contract - to date and about three more weeks of work remain before a final engineering report is complete.

Council had budgeted $36,000 for the engineering consulting.

Mr. Bowskill also told council there was no way anyone of the builders could act as project manager "gratis" as Coun. Marc Coombs had suggested Nov. 2.

He estimates it will cost council $85,000 to $100,000 to hire a project manager for Colborne Creek. Colborne lawyer Peter Hustler, the township's solicitor, was authorized by council Oct. 4 to "supervise and co-ordinate" the Colborne Creek project. Mr. Hustler, who is charging half his usual hourly rate to manage the project, which he describes as "still a fairly substantial charge," told council Oct. 19 the project really needs an experienced construction manager, which he isn't, to co-ordinate among the builders, contractors and sub-contractors and township.

Mayor Lee Dekeyser told council at the same meeting he has had informal discussions with a retired engineer in Cobourg who might be interested.

Mr. Bowskill told council Nov. 16: "No one can do it (manage the project) for free. Gratis doesn't work."

He recommended council put out a tender call for a project manager.

Council agreed and will draft terms for the tender to be brought back for consideration Nov. 30.

Council, led by Mr. Coombs, had tried at its Nov. 2 meeting to get Mr. Bowskill and local builders Mike Voskamp, Bill Rutherford, Jim Rutherford, Roger Cheer and John Kernaghan to manage the project for either free or at a nominal fee, although Mr. Dekeyser had disagreed saying the job should be put out for tender.

The first estimate from former chief administrative officer Merlin Dewing last Aug. 4 for a 57-lot subdivision called for $1.15 million in servicing costs by early October. D.M. Wills Associates Ltd. estimated the cost for a 60-lot subdivision had increased to between $1.7 and $2.2 million, potentially a 90.5 per cent increase in servicing costs. Now, Mr. Bowskill says no one knows yet what the final servicing costs will be. Estimates that would bump the lot servicing costs up from $20,265 per lot to as much as $36,666 per lot were contained in an Oct. 8 letter to township treasurer Mora Chatterson from David M. Wills, senior manager of D.M. Wills Associates Ltd.

Mr. Hustler advised the township last month to put the project on hold as lot servicing cost estimates skyrocketed, but council chose to ignore that advice.

Cramahe Township purchased the 46-acre Colborne Creek site on Division Street for $227,500 in May 2002.

The purchase was funded from Cramahe's future capital and proceeds from the sale of the Colborne Public Utilities Commission to Lakefront Utility Services of Cobourg. Council has decided to go ahead with at least the first seven homes on Division Street.

Mr. Bowskill said the project "contractors don't feel the town should bear one cent" ultimately and they should at least "get land costs and infrastructure costs back." The first seven lots on Division Street are being sold to builders by the township for $26,000 per lot.
