

Oswald used to tell that when he first started to clean land on his homestead he owned nothing except an axe which someone had given him. It was at this time that he came on the well preserved skull of a moose. There was a fine set of horns still attached to the skull. When he and Andrew built the house they hung the skull and horns on the west wall of the house under the upstairs window. They christened the farm "Moose Farm". The farm went by this name for many years. I can remember letters coming in the mail addressed to "Moose Farm". But in later years the name fell in to disuse, and was eventually dropped. The last time I saw it, the skull and horns were still hanging on the wall of the house.