

Lord and Lady Tweedsmuir

2

John Buchan (Lord Tweedsmuir) and Susan Grosvenor (Lady Tweedsmuir) were married at St. George's, Hanover Square, on July 15th, 1907. Lord Tweedsmuir had attended Oxford College and had ended his Oxford career extremely wealthy for an undergraduate, owing to having made money by writing while he was there and reading for two publishers. Strangely enough, in those days no one thought of him as a writer. He was marked for a brilliant career as a lawyer and politician.

After his marriage he worked hard at Nelson's London office and wrote articles for the Spectator. He wanted to join the army in 1914 for World War I but was told it was useless to think of it due to his state of health. In the spring of 1915 he acted as Times correspondent in France. In 1917 he was recalled from France to take over the job of Director of Information under the War Cabinet. His wife assisted him in the capacity of Government Cable and Wireless advisor. In 1918 Lord Beaverbrook became Minister of Information while Lord Tweedsmuir accepted the position of Director of Intelligence and his wife became Director of Propaganda.

At the end of the war Lord and Lady Tweedsmuir wrote a little book together "The Island of Sheep". The years between
