I raise my hat to the farmer. He may be very practical. He maybe very shrewd. He may know how to drive a hard bargain. But, for all that, he's a man of faith. His seed costs him a pretty penny. But he scatters it far and wide, and then comes home to supper, leaving it to lie, open for the birds to steal, at the mercy of wind and weather. And he has faith that, in time, he'll reap a harvest.

There's a parable there, you know... a parable that tells us to believe what we cannot see, to do our very best, and to leave the rest with God.

I've a feeling some of us might harvest more happiness if we trusted more implicitly.

Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering.

A MODERN MARTHA

This modern Martha serves with willing hands,
Small frosted cakes and fragrant cups of tea,
Once when trouble knocked upon my door
She was the first to come to me.

She has no special gift of anything,
No voice to sing immortal songs or lays,
And yet there's music in her happy face...
Her lovely presence is a song of praise.

Her house has shining walls and tidy shelves,
A quaint old-fashioned look about the rooms
As if the warp and woof of sunny hours
Was woven into days on happy looms.

She has the hands of Martha, strong and fine,
And yet the heart of Mary makes her see
Where there is need, and so her tender hands
Reach out to serve in loving ministry.
