For the Advance Memories

Our lives are made up of to-morrows, and yesterdays, and the present is merely the boundary line between the Past and the Future. From one to-morrow to another 'our petty pace moves on from day to day.' and our chief pleasure consists in looking forward to expected joys; tenderly burying these same delusions, to look forward to other hopes. I believe, though, that there is some satisfaction for all of us, at certain times, to recall the past events of life and to take some pleasures from memories as well as from hopes.

"When the twilight fades and evening comes on who does not take pleasure in reviewing the scenes of days gone by, and with what charm these old scenes come to mind." Like a landscape that is viewed afar off, or a beautiful picture with all harsh and disagreeable lines softened and made beautiful, so appears these memories, all the struggle and heart pang are forgotten and only the beautiful stands out in relief.

"The paths filled with thorns, in retrospect seem filled with roses, and only the present under the broad glare of actuality seems harsh and disagreeable. This is one reason why childhood days are so pleasurable; we forget the trifling griefs and sorrows and remember only what is pleasant, and this appears amplified and enlarged.

We all have our own memories and our own scenes of the long ago, and yet there are certain common characteristics. We take unbounded pleasure in reaching across to "sweet yesterday" to recall some glance, some trifle left behind, and to restore the joys long since faded. Up through the years come our thoughts and we reject the bitter and taste the sweet. The panorama of events passes quickly before us, the old home, the old companions, those days of "speechless yearning" now faded and gone. I think we have similar experiences and similar reveries, and though we are like "Ships that pass in the night" and have merely hailed each other on the great voyage of Life and may never meet again, yet I believe, when the months and years have flown and the living present has become the dead past, and when school days and school companions have become only memories of long ago, it will be found that among the pictures hung on our memories' walls will be those of our childhood days "when every sport could please." And when the years have rolled on and we think no more of School Days, perhaps some half forgotten song will set in motion those associated ideas of early days and in retrospect we shall again live through "The tender years."

"Ain't at music, a subtle speech, and touch, Tears fill the eye and pale lips sigh At that strange spell whose thrall is such Some old strain the heart strings frets Though one forgets."

Jos. Hoffman of Chesley obtained fish on a forged order and will live for the next six months in the Central Prison where his taste for fish will be somewhat curtailed.

When addressing the grand jury at the county court at Stratford, Judge Barron said, speaking of the present assessment system, "that the law which penalized a man because he painted his fence or made improvements was a blot on the statutes." His honor is right, and no one knows it better than the people at large. When a man tries to beautify his premises and the assessor comes along and taxes him for outlay, it makes him wish that the improvement had been left undone.

Three Dutchmen went to market to buy hogs, and took their wives with them. The names of the men were Hans, Klaus and Hendricks. The names of the wives were Gertrude, Anna and Kathrine, but it was not known which was the wife of each man. They each bought as many hogs as each man or woman paid shillings for each hog, and each man spent three guineas more than his wife. Hendricks bought 23 hogs more than Gertrude, and Klaus bought 11 more than Kathrine. What was the name of each man's wife?

Frank Atkins of East Luther, wanted the C. P. R. train to stop at Kelly's Crossing one night lately, and when the conductor refused his request he opened the door and jumped off. The trainmen reported the affair to the Arthur station master, who got the section men to go back and gather up the remains, but not a trace of blood could be found, for the lucky, if rash, young man escaped the least injury.—Grand Valley Star.

A strange story comes from Chicago. John Alexander Dowie, proprietor of the projected City of Perfect Goodness, to be founded near Chicago, found himself suddenly unable to speak while he was making the opening prayer in his church in that City on Sunday, the seventh of January. When, a few months ago, the late Mr. Moody's voice failed him, Mr. Dowie, who had not approved the work of the evangelist, exclaimed, standing on the same spot where he himself was stricken; "The Almighty has silenced Mr. Moody in direct answer to my prayer. A more remarkable coincidence has scarcely ever been recorded. But it conveys a moral to all, for, however people may be inclined to account for the fact, humility best becomes those who presume to interpret the decrees of Providence.

Henry Cooper of Shallow Lake, was arraigned before His Honor Judge Cross, in the County Judge's Criminal Court, on Thursday upon a charge of horse stealing, and pleaded guilty to the charge, and was sentenced by His Honor to six months in Central Prison.—O. S. Advertiser.
