Tom Wilkinson had looked forward to the fining of the 17th of December with some amount of pleasure. He was to spend it at ine house of his friend Jack Spencer of ine nouse Not only that, but Spencer's aunt, who kept house for him, had been kind and been kind been kind been kind to ask Amy Durant, Tom's fiancee, to come as well. Tom had but few opporto to least of meeting Amy, so he naturally was glad of this one, especially—but the reason why will soon be manifest. However, for some reason or other, he did not greatly er joy himself. Miss Spener, having taken the somewhat bold step, or her, of inviting the lovers to her house, did not see tit to leave them alone for an in-

Jack Spencer scarcely saw the fun of having Tom up to spend an evening trying to be alone with Miss Durant; so, after an bour's insipid music, and more insipid conrereation, he drew Tom out of the room on a very weak pretext, and dragged him off to "Look here, Tom, I've had enough of that cackle. Come and have a smoke. "I don't care if I do; but I'm afraid Amy won't half like my leaving her."

"Ouite a mistake; don't flatter yourself so Beeides, yon'll see plenty of her when you're married. She'll get on very well with my aunt now they're alone, and it sinkes me you weren't getting on very brilnantly. Now what's your particular weakness-Scotch or Irish?" "Irish, please."

"Ah, I thought so." "Why?" asked Wilkinson; "I generally take Scotch. "Yes. I know," replied Spencer, without colunteering any further information. lo a few minutes they had put on easy ackets, mixed their whiskey and water. ind settled down in casy chairs. "Now," said Spencer, "what will you

"I've some rather good cigars," was Wilsinson's reply; "Let me offer you one." He put his hand in his pocket.

"Confound it!" he exclaimed; "I must ave left my case in my great ccat." "Never mind, old man, try this pipe; it's Wilkinson took it, thinking at the same time the recommendation was a strange "What a jolly den you have !" he said as ne lit up. "Not so bad. Don't let my aunt hear you call it a den, though; it's a study."

Wilkinson laughed. "By Jove, though, Tom, I do study now, and no mistake. I'm one of the coming men, I can tell you. I'm going in for medicine on a new theory." "And how about your practice while you are perfecting your theory?" "Oh! my aunt will buy me a practice iast enough. Yes, my boy, I'm going to revolutionize medicine. No more doctoring up a man's body; that's a vast mis-

"What are you going to do then?" "Doctor up his mind.

Wilkinson smiled; he did not quite see what his friend was driving at. However, he had considerable interest in science, and still more in Jack Spencer's progress, so he aked to be further enlightened. There was nothing that Spencer wanted so much as an appreciative listener. He launched out under full sail.

"It's a perfect mystery to me, Tom, a d a few other men, why such marvellous phenomena as we hear of occasionally in the domain of electro-biology, as it's called, obtain so little scientific attention."

"There's such a lot of humbug connected with it," suggested Wilkinson.

'O' course there is, but it has a sound basis of fact. The science is in its infancy 38 yet, but it must grow. It is a known fact that one mind can influence another even at a distance, is it not?"

once saw a mesmerist, and certainly he seemed able to do anything, but I thought he was only a conjuror."

"Empirical generalization, unworthy of you, remarked Spencer. "I won't quote cases, though I might do so for a week, but look at those books, they are full of wellauthenticated, scientifically conducted, experiments.'

He took down from a shelf Darwin's "Zoenomia," Machish's "Philosophy of Sleep, and several volumes of the "Revue Scientifique.

"Now," continued Spence, "it is proved that the mesmerizer can control the will, the actions, even the belief of his subjects; if he gives him a draught of water he can make him believe it is champagne; if he gives him an ink bottle, he will smell it and think it a lovely rose." "Have you seen these experiments?" asked Wilkinson.

"Seen them? Why I've made them.' Wilkinsen looked up astonished.

"Yes," said Spencer, "that's why I feel such an interest in this business. I possess the power of mesmerizing to a considerable degree, and cultivate it every chance I get. Have a little more whiskey?" "Thanks, I will."

"Di course you will," replied Spencer with a satisfied smile. "I decided that while we were talking. Influence of one mind over another, you see."

Wilkinson made a hasty exclamation. He Was rather averse to being experimented on in this way.

"How is all this going to help you in doctoring?" he asked. "Simply enough. Induce a state of trance

"But can you always induce this

"That's a weak point, but in time we shall get over that. I can influence tour people out of five. Miss Durant, for instance, would be a very good subject."

Wilkinson sat silently smoking for a few Tilbutes. Apparently the mention of Amy's charle had turned his thoughts into another how that he could erjoy himself without

The two friends were son in the midst of an animated discussion of their former subject. Spencer told of various curious experiments in which the operator had questioned his victim on all sorts of subjects, obtaining replies to everything, even when the question was one which he could not have wished to reply to if conscious.

This made Wilkinson remark that the possession of this mesmeric gift placed a vast power in the hands of the operator. "Yes, it undoubtecly does. Fortunately scientific men are the last in the world to take advantage of it for private Wilkinson looked at his friend. "Did you ever try it from personal mo-

Spencer looked as if he wished the question had not been asked.

"I don't mind telling you, Tom-I did You remember Nellie Fletcher?' "Yes; I thought you liked her at one time."

"So I did. but I wanted to know if she liked me. I put her into a trance, with her consent, and made her an offer. She refused me."

"Didn't she remember anything about it afterward?"

"Not an atom. The best of it is that the subject can't help answering absolutely truly uninfluenced by etiquette or anything of that sort. You're a lucky fellow, Tom, to have been safe in proposing to Miss Durant without having to experiment first."

"Yes," was Tom's laconic reply. "No doubt about her liking you?" "I hope not, as we're engaged."

"You're a lucky dog, she's a charming Wilkinson naturally assented, but did not feel altogether pleased when Spencer began praising Miss Durant somewhat enthusiastically. He felt still less so when Spencer ended by saying:

"You don't know what a debt of gratitude you owe me, Tom. I could make her think you the meanest scamp on the earth, and I forbear." "What do you mean?"

"I mean she is a splendid subject. could easily gain complete control over her mind and continue the influence in the wak. ing state." Wilkinson began to feel uncomfortable, and changed the subject abruptly. Did you have a good time at the Kesterton's dance the other night?"

"Splendid," replied Spencer, warmly. He was not so wrapped up in science that he was unable to enjoy the lighter pleasures "I'm afraid you didu't though; you looked as if you had the blues." Tom could not say he had passed a pleasant evening. The truth was that Amy had, on that occasion, danced several times with Bartlett, a cousin, and a reputed old flame of hers. Tom was of a very jealous disposition, and had taken offense at it without explaining his reason. Consequently there had existed during the last few days decided coolness between the lovers, and Tom had hoped that on the present evening he might have a chance of making matters smooth again.

However, Amy had not felt called upon 154) Thirty Seven Well Bound Volumes to allude to her conduct, and he had not done so.

He wanted a confidant, and so he began to monopolize the talk; it was his turn. He told Jack the whole story, confessing his jealousy of Bartlett and asking his ad-

"My dear boy," said Spencer, "there's only one course open to you. You are making yourself miserable by this uncertainty ; wny not decide once for all whether Miss Du rant cares for you, and you only?"

"How can I?" "Easily enough. We will get her in here; I will mesmerize her, and while she is in the trance we will ask her if she cares two straws | reading matter for the home. It will inabout Bartlett."

"It's all very well for you to talk in this cary way; you don't know what it is to be jealous.

Wilkinson. "What possible excuse can we have for asking her?" "We don't want one," replied Spencer, confidently; "all we have to do is to will that she shall come." "I don't believe it." "Let's try," suggested Spencer. "We may fail, I acknowledge; we can but try.' After a moment's hesitation Wilkinson assented. "Now," said Spencer, "concentrate your Promenaders in Washington often stop to look at a pair of high-stepping, black, blooded horses attached to a high road waggon, driven by a handsome, military appearing man of some fifty years, who is invariably accompanied by a handsome, matronly lady and two or three bright eyed little girls. The driver is Jerome Napoleon Bonaparte, grandson of the Bonaparte's eldest brother Jerome, and who possesses, it is asserted, the first right to whatever claim the Bonapartes may have to the imperial throne of France. The lady is Madame Bonaparte, a
