When first we came to Holland's grounds, From where the Humber flows, Our path was strewn full three feet deep With winter's drifting snews.

No stately coach along the line, Upon its wheels could go; But sledges smooth and swift did glide Upon the frozen snow.

Then desolution reigned supreme And naught appeared around, But snow clad bills and lonly streams In icy fetters bound.

The forest stood as thick as when Before the food it grew, But soon a clearing long and wide Appeared to please the yiew.

With sturdy arms and axes keen, Two youths that forest felled, And soon a dwelling rose to sight Where late the avage yelled.

The house then was composed of logs Upon a gentle hill, And joined together at their ends With scientific skill.

The cedar swamp then lent its aid And furnished us with means With shingles then and neatly laid For to keep out the rains.

Her father Adam's sentence then Upon us fell full sore, But all with patient fortitude Our lads and lassies bore.

The words of Israel's sage proved true, Even here among the wilds, And many a comfort we enjoyed For those we left behind.

No real want we ever knew. Thou h homely was our fare; With thankful and contented hearts We banished grief and care.

Our lads the forest ranged for game And sometimes a fat buck 124ly Or doe rewarded them if they Upon their track had struck.

> A blazing fire adorned our hearth And cheerful faces round Sat gossiping or listning To music's lively sound.

The Matron and her Maiden then,

Like Watt's busy bee, Improved the time with easy toil Or vocal melody. Of all the Bestial train,

Was then our friend, for to his strength We looked for future gain. With patience slow and solemn tread, His devious way he wound

Most splendid furniture; O bird eye maple how I love To have such garniture. But now the sun in Taurus takes

When turned and polished it doth make.

His systematic place And nature now begins to wear A mild and cheerful lace.

Grim heary winter takes his flight The snow doth disappear, And busy labour now begins To occupy the year.

The feathered tribe now visit us From distant sumy climes And grateful to our ears is the Sweet music of their chimes.

The wood pecker that taps the trees For its sustaning food And pigeons numberless which come Do nurish their young brood.

The woods do now begin to wear

Their bright green summer's dress,

And cattle now their pastures find in the wild wilderness.

With rapid strokes the mower goes Among the ripened wheat And cuts it down in even rows Upon the ground so neat. The careful rake then follows him, Held by some maiden fair,

The heavy wain by horses drawn Was scarcely to be found Among the settlers of the time For many miles around.

Instead of them the ox and sleigh, (Though they were rather slow,) Were used to carry in the crop And place it in the mow. The healing art, though highly prized,

Was seldom practiced here,

For temperance and labour joined its cavishing trains fell to thing Can't You Sleep!

Many persons find themselves troubled by wakefulness. Some resort to the Hydrate of Chioral and other drugs to produce sleep. Such drugs, it their use is once begun, have to be continued, and in increasing doses, and every effert should be to induce sleep in some other way. Among the methods that have been suggested, is the stopping of all study or serious reading, half an hour before bed-time and to take sufficient exercise with dumb bells or Indian clubs to produce a warm glow of the body, and then jump into bed. In winter sleep in a flannel night-gown, and between blankets inside of cold sheets. The attempt, when in bed, to read some amusing novel may be made, in order to divert the mind from the wakefulness. A second method is, instead of reading, to repeat a poem with which one is familiar. Another plan is, to draw in a long, slow breath by the mouth, and force the breath out through the nose, imagining that the two currents can be distinctly seen. The mind is to be kept fixed upon the operation of breathing, and the endeavor to see the currents as they areexpelled. One of our editorial associates finds relief by wetting a cloth with cold water and placing this across. the forehead, and binding it in place by means of a towel. It is worth while to give either of these methods a thorough trial rather than to resort. to drugs of any kind .- American Agriculturist for November.
