The Lassie's Secret. BY ARCHIE MACK.

When evening dews are falling At close of summer's day, When twilight droops her mantle, I hasten quick away, To meet beneath the shadows My lover brave and true,

Sweeter than honey'd dew. If you but knew my Willie You'd wonder then no more Why I'm so gay and happy, For him I do adore. And in return, he loves me,

To listen to his whisper

So fondly and so true, And every night he meets me When falls the evening dew. We whisper low our secrets, The birds e'en cannot hear

The honey'd words my Willie Breathes in my listening ear. Nor yet my low responses Beneath the willow tree, As with his fond carresses He vows his love for me.

Some say my Willie's handsome. Some say my Willie's plain, Some say it for to please me And some to give me pain. I know how kind and gentle His dark eyes grow to be, When in the starry twilight He breathes his love to me.

I know how sweet and low is His voice at close of day, When turned with man's affection He pours love's gentle lay. He seems to me so handsome. So grand, so brave, and true, At morning dawn, and noontide, And 'neath the falling dew.

BY NORA LAUGHER, When the maples move in the winter breeze And the snowflakes lie neath the leafless trees In a bright Canadian street I hear the sparrows greet Each other cheerily, Always cheerily! What, what little bird,

What was it I heard? Tut, tut, Cheer up, cheer up Never wearily !

And the little boys and the little girls With their fur capped heads and their hooded curls In the pleasant, winter day Happily engaged in play, Oh, no, never wearily, Always cheerily! Well, well, little girl With the golden curl, Tut, tut, Cheer up, cheer up

Never wearily !

Dr. R. Couetoux, of France, reports two cases, aged six and nine years of diphtheria. When death was apparently imminent, and treacheotomy had been refused as a last resort he ordered inhalations of steam, tinctured with cubebs, of which twenty-five grammes were placed in the boiler at once, and the steam being conveyed by tubes to the beds of the children to be inhaled by them. Both made a good recovery. Dr. Couetoux says that cubebs used in this way against the diphtheria is more powerful than eucalyptus, glycerine, tar, or the essence of terebinthina.
