WILD ELEPHANT HUNTING. the Great Beast in the Jungles of

The village of Kottiar lies in the centre of Robert Knox, "the historian," (apt. Robert Knox, in the year 1659, were of the Kandyans and the control of the control enayed by the Kandyans, and thence errayed of their mountain strongis to remain in captivity for a period of inds, to rears, by order of Rajah Singh II. a neat little Government rest-house for proprietors. the use of travellers (built in the time of te Dutch occupation) lies close to the landits place, and is at present in charge of a piece of ebony called Mr. Lignum Vitæ. A piece of econy made to all who occupy it, assist in defraying expenses.

We commenced our journey up river, but not being able to obtain sufficient canoes, the coolies had to walk up the banks, and pencourage them through the jungle we sech took it in turn to walk with them. By revent heavy rains up country the river had infortunately greatly swollen, and the banks in many places were overflown, also the surrounding flat country; what were riginally rivulets running into the Ganga originally became flowing rivers, and our progress ander the circumstances was much retarded. Most of the shallow streams were got over, jot many deep and wide ones had to be crossed, and this was done by cutting a fairly straight young tree and placing it beween the forks of two others on either gown. bank, then making a hand-rail of jungle pope, and in this way we had little difficulty in crossing several of the worst streams. In one instance only the hand rail broke, precipitating a coolie with a case of our precious provisions into the running stream, which Tas of course lost forever and carried away by the current. The coolie was luckily

Having arrived safe and sound at Kanda Kadu, we pitched our tent, changed into ar clothing, fixed our camp beds, lit a roaring fire, roasted the fatted calf, and dined "truly rural" on the fat of the land, and soon retired for the night. Rising early pext morning from a most refreshing sleep, re found our trackers already on the alert. also a Veddah (one of the aborigines or wild men of the woods), who offered his services, which were accepted. After seeing to our runs and ammunition, and taking with us few refreshments, we began our march after the rogue who had been reported to the neighborhood of late, and could not then be very far off, as he had paid a visit during the night to one of the villagers' gardens not

After nearly three hours' wading through the jungle with water up to our waists, we came upon our game, and had only just time to slip behind one or two good trees when the elephant suddenly made his appearance, making straight for us. I took the first shot, and, giving him the contents of my 12-bore rifle at twelve paces just over the eye, he threw up his head, turned tail, and fled, trumpeting, smashing and leveling everything in his headlong career. It was impossible then to give him a second shot, owing to the large volume of smoke, which would not rise, the atmosphere being too damp ; but we immediately gave chase, and after a most exciting run of twenty minutes came upon him again in a far better jungle. I was again lucky enough to be first in the field, and with a well-directed shot placed just behind the ear the ponderous brute toppled over, dead, close to a jungle palm. After taking the brush we drank our very good health, and were not at all sorry for a refresher after so long and exciting a chase under the rays of the tropical sun.

To return to our camp. To save time and distance in retracing our steps we decided to cross the river, so we sent off our trackers to cut decayed jungle trees. Having done this, and brought the trunks to the river's side, we lashed them together and made a raft, and then launched it into the river. No sooner had we done so than a loud bark and splash came from a group of mangroves on the opposite side. We looked at each other, and all knew well what those ominous splashes meant: but nevertheless we had made up our raft and minds also to cross. The ferryman, or Kanda Kadu, who accompanied us, a by no means inferior tracker, and known to most sportsmen who have travelled in this part of the country, was a very strong Moor, as plucky as they can be made, and a perfect fish in the water. Having placed all the guns and ammunition on the raft, he boldly plunged into the river, regardless of the crccodiles and swam across with it and its contents to the other side, and, having safely landed the cargo, brought the raft back for us, making a noise the while something like thu! thu! to drive away his amphibious friends. The eldest member of our party had the seat of honor on the raft, and the other two, not liking to be outdone by the old ferryman, agreed to assist their comrade over on this occasion; so we plunged in also in our hunting attire and after some timeour minds were set at rest by touching ground on the opposite bank.
