LYNDON OF HIGHFIELD

AN OLD SOLDIER'S LOVE STORY

By C. Denslow, Author of "When the Tide was High," "The Artist and the Man," "Into a Larger Room," Etc., Etc.

CHAPTER IX.

ETTRICK, AND DEEP DRAINS.

A. Mr. Windham came back the next day, bringing news that gave the greatest pleasure to Mrs. Brougham. Mrs. Percy had exchanged. The colonel was now attacked at the moment, "Edinburgh," he had joined at once, and there he had been told that he would be allowed to leave.

For the few days of Percy's absence—there were many which naturally strengthened Lady Flora's attachment to Ettrick—there was less difference between the Castle and farm than there had been. Both houses were busy preparing for the necessary shooting parties, which, however, was one reason for the gathering of the family, who were over alone to take a message from her father to Mrs. Wimsey, and to Lady Flora.

"We are not so well as you are, Mother," said Percy, "but I can't say that it is not a great relief."

"I am not so well as you are, Mother," said Percy, "but I can't say that it is not a great relief."

"I am not so well as you are, Mother," said Percy, "but I can't say that it is not a great relief."

"I am not so well as you are, Mother," said Percy, "but I can't say that it is not a great relief."
