Her parents were not wealthy, but were confortably well off, and we thought it would be such a good match for Will and Maude to marry, for it would bring two nice families into closer friendship.

About the time we thought the happy day was set, a young man named Len Allen, who had been out West for some time, returned home. He had not had an extra good made before he left, but he came back to so fashiohably dressed and cut such a dash that the boys took right up with him. I could not help feeling sorry when I saw Will going around with him some, Some, how I could not feel that Allen was as good as he might be, and I was afraid he would he lead Will astray, for he was young and full so fife and I thought easy, to fail in with I the ways of any one he was in company we will sent the company to the way of any one he was in company to the conformation.

She said she would come and scemed pleased to do so, as it was a change and it took her thoughts off a little from "my Will" as she used to call him.

After tea was over we were sitting by the door when who should pass but Will and Allen.

"Hello, Mande, fine evening," cried Will in a rattler thick voice, and I saw she but barely indided to him, and steephed back into the room and burst out crying.

I went to her putting my arms around her and asked her to tell me her trouble saying that I would lie a true friend and her and asked her to tell me her trouble saying that I would lie a true friend and perhaps I could help her.

"On, idea," sobbed she, "its just does not seem possible that he can be my Will so fit: "The rule was; "Do not laugh too of whom I was so proud, and to think how happy we were until that Allen came."

"But what is the matter with Will and what has Allen done?" I asked.

"You how how intimate with Will has been with Allen lately. He stopped coming to my hather said he had heard that he was a gamblor and drinker and that he was taking Will with him as fast as he could and said that he wanted the engage."

That afternoon I was so surprised. One of my neighbors told me that she had heard that Will and Mande had gone to Berryville and were married, and that her father was terribly excited, and had just gone to town to get a revolver, saying he was going to kill Will. He ran around like a mad man all the afternoon. When he got angry he never had any sense, but he was always sorry in a little while, and I was was always sorry in a little while, and I was always always always always always always alwa three ways left to us of meeting the difficulty

now. It is too late to grow corn for the

although if put in at once it might yet answer for the latter purpose.

Three things may yet be done which will prove helpful if rains come soon. Our clover meadows may be cut early, and we can grow cern. On this farm we have so acres of rye. We have been using it since about the first of the month for the stock, and have some twenty acres of it standing in the shock, to be used as winter fodder.

The remaining portion will be put in the silo. The ground on which it grew is now being ploughed for rape. We have thus secured a crop which this year is more valuable, acre for acre, than hay. We expect to get a crop of rape, as last year, of more value for feeding than the rye, will theroughly clean the ground at the same for growing crop the following year.

Of course many of our farmers know a about the subjects of which this letter treats but sometimes there is no harm in being reminded of what we already know.
