Although we all followed the Empress, none of us seemed to gain upon her. Flying we passed through the little town, much to the amazement and the terror of the few poople in the streets. A short distance be yound the town was a shipping canal, and, to our horror, we saw that the drawbridge spanning the canal was open, so as to permit the passage of some boat. In a mounent we realized that the Empress was running straight into the jaws of death.

Faster and faster we went on in pursuit, but faster and faster also seemed the Empress' horse to fly. Now it had reached the open bridge. Would it stop? Before we had time to think, we saw the animal dash up, the incline of the open bridge like a flash.

By pen is too weak to describe the confusion among us and the agony of suspense that followed, and seemed to make each rider quiver in his saddle. Almost unconsciously we had stopped our horses just before reaching the incline to the open draw. As a matter of fact our excitement was so great that we did not even notice that one of our number, Count Szepany, if I remember well, was also missing. All our faculties naturally had followed the Empress only.

There we were halting before that terrible bridge like a pack of cowards, with There we were; halting before that per-rible bridge like a pack of cowards, with nobody among us blucky enough to ride into death with an Empress. The Empress' horse was very lame, and closer examination showed that it had discount it right hind fetlock. In jumping the open draw between the wings of the bridge the hind feet of the Empress' horse had caught one of the iron rails at the edge and torn off one of its hind shoes. The most extraordinary feature of the accident was how the horse ever coulth have grown deeps.
