Lead-poisoning is not, as a rule, the result of a single dose of lead. It is the result of a long and continued use of lead. It is the result of a long and continued use of lead. It is the result of a long and continued use of lead.

A British medical journal relates an instance in which a patient, who had been suffering from lead-poisoning, was treated with a large quantity of a certain medicine. The patient was cured.

The symptoms most commonly resulting in these instances were colic, constipation, tremor of the limbs, neuralgic pains, wasting, and similar "nervous" disturbances.

Such cases point to the fact that the habit of eating a small quantity of the same food would be caused by a large quantity of the same food.

The writer recalls a case in point. A practitioner was called to attend an elderly gentleman who had been suffering from lead-poisoning for several years.
