Few people, are aware that buried among the woods between Kew and Richmond is a very charming old cottage called "The Queen's Teallouse." It was built for Queen Charlotte, who used to come there often during her most weary years of waiting to drink a dish of tea. There is still in it some rare old blue delifted ware, pretty chintzes and valuable prints. This little bodge, which has only two rooms and a kitchien; is also weighted with retainers and the "keeper of the queen's cottage" has a house and salary from the lord chamberlain's department. All round the green at Klw are a number of small and large house, the property of Queen Victoria. They were originally built to hold George III.'s suite during his insanity. Lord Forester, as the descendant and representative of John Forester, of Watingstreet, County Salop, to whom the still Mort enjoys the privilege, if it is one, of remaining covered in the presence of royal kings of England, his first obeisance llaving been made. Lord Kingsdale inherits a smallar doubtful distinction, but in the former case the grant was made for some snysterious and unexplained reason to a commoner; in the latter to the Irish Earl of Ulster, John 184

the latter to the Irish Eart of Clister, John de Courcy, as far back as the reign of King John, while the Forester peerage is hardly more than seventy years old.

The King of England and Philip II. of France agreed to settle some dispute as to that very fruitful subject of contention, the Norman duchy, by single combat. The Earl of Ulster represented England, and Earl of Ulater represented England, and no sooner pat in an appearance than the French knight selected to oppose him put spurs to his horse and bolled. King John then made the usual imprudent promise of the period to grant the earl anything he might choose to ask, and the good earl, who had good reasons for despising Lackland, declared that he simply wished to be saved the trouble of removing his his head covering in this head covering in the same and the wished to be saved the trouble of removing his head covering in future out of courting instinct. The hords Kingshalo have occasionally claimed their "privilege," once for obvious reasons, after the abdication of tion of James II., when Duten William commented on the apparent disrespect to his royal dignity, and then gldomily assented, and at a much later period one of them is said to have kept his hat on in the presence of George III.

The Flight of Bees.

Many authors have attempted to answer this question, but none have succeeded. Theoretically, the solution has been attempted by counting the number of wingbeats per second, and from that, to guess the distance the bees fly from their hives. The results have distered widely, varying from two to twelve linglish miles. According to Prof. Marcy's "graphic method," the bees make 190 wing beatts per second. His method consists in tastelings a been in such bees, make 190 wing-betts per second. His method consists in fastening a bee in such a way that its wing; are free to move, one of them touching lightly a rolating cylinder coveced with a smooth and lightly hlackened paper. Prof. Landois, who has studied the sound apparatus of many animals, thinks, from the pitchl of the sounds made by the vibrating wings, that they move to and from a the rate of 400 vibrations per second—more than double Marchine in such as the second—more than double Marchine.
