According to a Tiliamook County (Ore.) farmer, the species of sea bird known as the great nuk is not extinct. He declares that two birds of this family, presumably a male and a female, have been rocsting in a very large spruce tree near his place for several months. By the add of a field glass the settler, who is a naturalist of local renown, has, he claims, identified them beyond doubt as fine specimens of the great auk family.

From their settlens the settler believes they will remain in his neighborhood and possibly raise a brood of young ones in the spring. He is encouraging them to stay, by giving them access to his wheat field, where they feed every day after the manner of geese. young ones in a steering-gear, that will permit of its an airtight steel carp, by giving them access to his wheat field, where they feed every day after the manner of geose.

It is highly improbable that the birds visiting the Tillamook farmer are great auks. The famous bird, before its generally credited extinction, was found only in the northeastern part of this continent and in Northern Europe. The fact that they have built their nests in a spruce tree is also against the farmer's theory.

The great auk measured about three feet in length, had a large bill and, as stated, very small wings. The fact that the species is supposed to be now extinct gives great value to the remains now existing. According to Prof. Nowton, there are seventy-one or seventy-two skihs, nine skeletons, thirty-eight or forty-one detached bones of different birds and sixty; the eggs.

Should the Tillamook farmer's birds prove to be great auks he will be well repaid for any trouble or expense in the way of the destruction of his wheat field.
