Rag'carpets are certainly hardly worth the trouble of doing. It is best to make them I yard wide and of any length desired. Odd pieces of sitk, print, list, flannel, muslin, etc., can all be utilized. They should be cut into strips of half an texh with controls. They should be cut into strips of half an inch wide, or in very thir materials wider, so that they can be folded to the same width. The strips must be sewed together perfectly flat, wound into a ball just 1 jound weight each. The similar ball should be made of any bright rid pleces. Nine such balls should then be dispatched to the weaver, who charges only a few cents per yard.

Be careful to sew the ends very strong by together or else the whole effect is lost. There are two ways of making "rag carpets," both of which a woman of leisure, might like to try One way, and perhaps the most satisfactory way, is to sort the rags and cut them in equal lengths and equal breaths. Keep all the thickest rags separate from the thinner ones. Get a square of course and rather open sade ing the size you desire the carpet to be, and procure from any fremmonger a cording to the size of the carpet. Work the lighter rags into the center, using two together should they be very thin. If ossible, make the border carpets are extremely strong, and will last for many years. Another way of using the graphs after again sorting and entring them in equal lengths and breadths, is to join all the pleces tiggether with black thread and wind them up into large balls. Then, with a large wooden grounds hook these way he croched they rochet hook, these may be crocheted in strips not too wide, and afterwards sewed together with strong twin, or, if pre ferred, the strips may be knitted togethe
