The Lost World

BY ANDRE LAURIE

"What do you mean?" cried Mme. Caudoual, while the doctor, speechless with surprise, waited to see what would come next.

"I also, with your permission, trust myself to the care of the physician who has the honor of examining Atlantis, before returning to her."

"The potion of the Atlanteans!" ex-

"try to make

"Such a plan is preposterous,"

"Great disappointment awaited Atlantis,

"getting better." Charles

"more freely, seemed to grow weaker as the night advanced."

"He remarked that perhaps the drugs had lost strength or that some inci-

"In fact he had made in the selection of his ingredients."

"Charles has made no mistake,"

"of those of his art," replied Atlantis,

"as well as of those of his art."

"What child, you cannot in earnest,"

"allow me to permit you to run such a

"risk?"

"And why impossible, dear aunt?"

"My dear, such a thing was

"never heard of—never seen."

"Then it is time that I am, undoubtedly Helen's little pettily."

"What child, you cannot in earnest,"

"allow me to permit you to run such a

"risk?"

"It is not Reina fails all these dangers,

"and I have not escaped without a scratch,"

"and I have not been Edeline to expose him,"

"which you consider too

"dangerous."

"Never, Mme. Caudoual, nor Dr. Patrice

"have right to tempt the elements

"to combat."

"The argument that the weight

"of Helen's body is great,"

"Here Helen could not help

"spreading her envy of English and

"the world with a sly sneer and

"the censure of society. After a

"moment of thoughtful silence she

"said, 'Are you not going along, Aunt
