TUMBLING GIRL IN A CAR.

She Was Pretty, But Wouldn't Hold Her Head Up.

All the other passengers in the cab car wondered why she didn't hold her head up and stand right side up. She was so straggled and attracted that one would expect better things of her, but she stood with both hands tucked in her muff, and every time the car struck a curve, or the car grew a little shaky, she bent herself in the way of being arrested for assault and battery.

As first the man who was avenging from straps didn't object to her tactics. They caught her indignantly and enjoyed doing it, but in time even rescuing a poor girl falls out of them and there are no further developments. The fat man just in front of her, who received the first shock of her chaotic ministrations to his one in particular that it was a woman people wouldn't hold themselves up occasionally, and a thoughtful looking youth remarked in an undertone that there was no telling from personal appearances, when one was a blushing idiot.

The interest of all the passengers was centered upon the girl. There was a faint censure about her gestures. When the car stopped or started every eye was fixed on the offender. When people realized that the car was heaving a curve the women drew their feet out of harm's way, the men took a firm grip on the straps and braced themselves, and there was tense expectancy written on every face. The girl never disappointed them. She slid wretchedly fast and her cheeks grew redder and redder, she looked prettier and prettier, but she kept her hands in her muff.

When at last two women left the car and the tumbler sank into a seat a girl came up and sat next to her. She was curiously dressed in the air but curiously wasn't appressed.

Just then a handsome and perfectly-governed woman entered the car and the tumbler girl looked at her with her eyes wide open. "Why, mamma!" she said. "Then she laughed, and blushed, and laughed some more." "I'm having the most awful time," she whispered. "I've nearly killed two or three men and every one on the car thinks I'm crazy, but I just couldn't take my hands out of my muff, and hold that horrid strap. Just look here."

She gave a further glance around the car to see if anyone had noticed her. She slipped her hands out of the muff and wigged her pink finger tips, sticking defiantly out of her lateral fingers of most disreputable gloves.

"They're your garden gloves. I picked them up and ran, and when I found out that I had them worn't time to go home so I just slipped them on. I thought nobody would see them, until I got down. And as the car was on the 'T' her mind flung on standing up in this horrid car. Wasn't I dreadful?"

The woman who wondered why she did it, chuckled, but "mamma" was shocked; and the fat man, still fastidiously taking his hands off her, said "some pretty girls have absolutely no sense."

At the moment for Grinding Corn.

J. A. Perrotte recently discovered and secured two most perfect prehistoric mill stones. They were taken from the floor of a room in the eighth story of the prehistoric Montezuma (Arizona) castle. Four feet of bat guano was taken from the floor and the stones found under it. The larger stone weighs over 100 pounds and Mr. Perrotte had some difficulty in descending the four ladders placed at the foot of the hole to the top of the castle, a distance of 100 feet. The metal is about two feet long by eighteen inches wide, is of like granite, and must have been used for years, as the slope is worn down so that the outer edges are several inches higher than the bottom of the groove in which the smaller stone stood up and down, crushing the grain. The smaller stone or grinder was found near the larger.
