Not long ago it was reported that treaty nad been concluded between Great Britain and Portugal whereby the former power was to acquire that part of the Portuguese possessions in East Africa which lies between the Komati River, on the north and the frontier of Tonga Land, which is a British possession. The strip said to ave been ceded includes, of course, Delagoa Bay, the importance of which has been previously recognized and is amphasized by the present war. Even if such a treaty had been concluded. it would not be valid unless ratified by the Portuguese Cortes, and expersions has shown that such ratification would be doubtful.
