THE MOST OF FARM MANURES.

To preserve my manures in the best way a shed, built as a leanto against the barn, is on the two open sides boarded up three feet high with an entrance at one end. In this shed the cows are usually kept over night and during bad weather. They tramp together and moisten the coarse straw as thrown out when cleaning the horse stables, and convery this into a well-rotted mass of excellent quality. Everything spitable for the purposes, besides straw, is uesd as bedding for the cows, weeds, rakings from the flower garden, leaves and pine needles, in short everything that will help to make a clean surface and will Tot underneath. Months of time, and hours of patient, intelligent effort are expended to make the horse a fast trotter, a high actor, a perfectly gaited saddle horse, but so far as the walk goes, he is generally put upon the market as nature made him and rolls along at the pace his ambition dictates, commended by his owner as a wonder if he happens to walk fast, and sworn at and overdriven by every one if he chances to be lazy and slow. The fast walker is often made so by being put with a mate while breaking which happened to be a quick, free mover, and no farmer of breeder can be too careful in seeing to it that no colt of his is ever driven or led beside a sluggish mactive partner.
