

TO PURIFY LONDON

General Crusade Against Vice Has Been Started

A despatch from London says—London is on the eve of the greatest crusade against vice in its history. More than a thousand eminent persons, representing every borough in the metropolis, have associated themselves together for the purpose of repressing public immorality, disorderly houses, obscene language, pernicious pictures, publications and plays. Among the active supporters of the movement are Lord Roberts and Lord Wolseley, the Bishop of London, Lord Chamberlain, Archbishop Vaughan, Archdeacon Wilberforce, Sir W. H. Broadbent, M.D., Sir Doyle, Duke of Devonshire, and Rev. Hugh Hughes. One of 1,349 borough councillors are already pledged to support the crusade programme. Twenty-nine centres of work have been opened, covering the whole of London. The police have modified their attitude towards vice under scrutiny. The sympathy of the magistrature has been enlisted, and they have promised to enforce the law with the greatest severity.

The opening gun of the crusade was fired on Tuesday, when a petition was presented to the Westminster City Council, signed by sixty of the foremost persons in the kingdom, praying that an aggressive campaign against social immorality be begun.

TERRIBLE TRAGEDY

Boy Killed at Vankleek Hill Blowing Up Mimic Fort

A despatch from Vankleek Hill, Ont., says—Robert Denton, 12 years of age, died on Thursday at the home of his father, Matthew Denton, Derby Avenue, as the result of an explosion of gunpowder. His brother, Douglas, was also seriously injured. About 15 boys gathered on Thursday afternoon in Mr. Denton's yard, and grew very excited, fruiting about the fourth year. From the seeds of the egg-shaped fruit there is pressed a white substance which hardens into a talcum powder. This powder is used in a position to blow up the fort. The powder was used to set fire to it by lighting a match to the powder. The result was an explosion, which set the boy's clothing on fire, and his legs, arms, hands, and feet were terribly burned. He was carried to a stream of water which was used to extinguish the fire. His younger brother was injured in the effort to save him.

TALLOW FROM A TREE

The tallow-tree, a curious Chinese plant, has been introduced into Canada with considerable success. It is a sort of cactus, and grows very rapidly, fruiting about the fourth year. From the seeds of the egg-shaped fruit there is pressed a white substance which hardens into a talcum powder. This powder is used in a position to blow up the fort. The powder was used to set fire to it by lighting a match to the powder. The result was an explosion, which set the boy's clothing on fire, and his legs, arms, hands, and feet were terribly burned. He was carried to a stream of water which was used to extinguish the fire. His younger brother was injured in the effort to save him.

A NEW FLOORING

A German chemist is reported to have found means by mixing sawdust with certain chemicals, of producing a flooring which is as hard and smooth as marble or concrete, and yet elastic and warm to walk on. It is stated to be fireproof, impervious, and sound-deadening, and has been laid down for some years in various places. It is a very important point from a hygienic point of view. It hardens completely in forty-eight hours.

SENTIMENT AND DISCRETION

Billy—Did she accept you?
Crick—Well, she said she'd make a memorandum of my proposal and consider it when the weather gets favorable for mental effort.

PAST AND FUTURE

The secret of happiness is to live in the present.
That's so; but my wife is always asking me to go to-morrow, and I'll collectors, you know, won't let you forget yesterday.

AGAINST VIVISECTION

Mr. Woodward—Your papa is such a miser.
Miss Willin—Why?
Mr. Woodward—Because when I asked your hand he refused me, saying I didn't want any mutilated members in his family.

OUT OF PLACE

Cholly—I get such frightful headaches lately. Doctor thinks, perhaps, there's some foreign substance in my brain.
Miss Pepprey—An idea, perhaps.

A NAPOLEON IS WANTED

One day Corporal came to great indignation to the major, for a coffin had been sent that was a little too small. The corpora, said his "subordinate" was a nice Church of England young man, whom he did not think of placing in side-ways. "Every man, major," said Corporal, "with decision," "likes to be buried lying flat down, and other pine shell, and wrote and told the widow all was well. She precise was the "Corps Master," as I used to punch pieces of tin with the names, rank, date of death, and numbers of the deceased, and pin them to the bodies, for purposes of subsequent identification. It had been better that practice had been generally followed, for there are many unrecorded graves and dead soldiers who cannot be by any possibility identified if the plan of removing all remains to general cemeteries is ever carried out. Corporal said he didn't want any of his corpses mixed up, and he wanted no widows like her at Colenso, to be going off with the wrong man's body. "No body," he sagely observed, "likes to take home a corpse as not being to them. And when you find it isn't yours you feel like chucking it out." He refused to take any corpses into his head-house without the medical sheet and identification cards. I'll have no mistakes. I mark an R.C. with his name round the right big toe, and the left big toe for the Protestants, that helps when the service is coming on to give the parson his cue. Corporal was married and has given many hostages to fortune, and his better half is as full of faith as himself, that the young mouths are sent to all side. When he left the army on this side, having been his discharge, he went to Major Hayes and remarked: "Sir, I'm going away. You've been very kind. I should like to have the honor of shaking hands with you; I've just washed mine, and ain't touched a corpse to-day. Thank you, sir; good-bye to you," and Corporal bowed himself out and grinningly saluted.

THE CORPORA'S METHODS

Shortly after Corporal was asked the night to come and look how well he had arranged the dead house, and that he had there two hundred and some boys, one a Church of England, and the other a R.C. "No," said Major Hayes, "although I am a medical man I have no curiosity nor tastes in that direction. All I hope is you conduct the funerals in a becoming manner." "Oh, yes, sir," said Corporal, "I always sits, on a bench in front of the wagon we have for a horse to take them to the cemetery. I could cry to think we ain't got horses to draw them, but only oxen, and sometimes mules. And I does my best, and feels sad. And I consers that poor remains with the Union Jack. When we are full the Union Jack is not big enough, and if you please, sir, I wants two more Union Jacks. It isn't decent." And he got stuck. On another occasion, Corps Master Corporal vexedly complained of the most irregular way the Tommies sometimes carried, the bodies into the cemetery, taking them in head, instead of feet first. "I've spoke to the regiment about it, and they have told me to correct it, and have your authority, major please." "Yes, certainly," said Major Hayes, and that subject was dropped. Then Corporal added: "Yes, sir; one of the clergermen is very good to me. He knows I've a very job to do at times, and he very often gives me a drop of something when I feels faint. I am not feeling very well just now, sir." Ah! Major Hayes took the hint, for he gave him a good liquor was was wondrously appreciated by those with a taste for the article. After that, Corporal became contented. "Sir, I always arrange the funerals most decorously. The parson that is burying him does his religious, and whichsomever he be, I'll give him a name for a mourner and all the Amen's." In a loud voice. And towards him, in a loud voice. "Get on, on quick enough, I can do any work you give me, as well as ever service for. I knows it all, by repeating when he forgets. Now there was an officer with the burial party that, as it was not he tells the men to keep their hats on, but I took mine off, for as I said to him, I'd rather have sunstroke and take my helmet off than not pay my respects to the corpse."

APPROPRIATE TEXTS

Foot Corporal was found fault with by the chaplains for writing texts and placing them on the Major Hayes. His explanation was, "Please, sir, I takes them texts out of the Bible. I has one lot for the married men and another for the single. For the single men, I says, 'I'm dead, but gone to his Father's heaven, and for the married ones, I'm one myself. Not dead, only dead to the Lord.' If he has got sorrowing and loving widows and children, I writes a verse, 'From his first, and if I finds any little trinkets in their pockets, I knows the widows would like to have, I write and sends them home to the missis and mother. I asks them to pay my postage expense, and I ain't a rich man, and, bless you, sir, I knows more than they generally sends me back home. I knows if I was dead it would be the same way with my

PIANIST AND CHILD

She was a pretty and winsome little child of five or six summers, and was returning from the States with her parents on a great Atlantic liner. "Paderewski happened to be travelling on the same boat. As his wont when travelling by sea, he rose early one morning to take his walk on deck before breakfast. As the deck the faint sound of a child playing the piano reached his ears. He stopped and listened. Hastily making his way to the saloon, he there found the little child endeavoring to finger out one of her set pieces. Shyness overtook her when she found that a big man was watching her, and her tiny fingers wandered over the wrong notes. "May I help you?" said Paderewski. "Perhaps I could give you a little assistance." "Oh, no, thank you," replied the little one. "I am sure you couldn't play any piece."
