Useful Recipe for Making the Mixture, and How to Apply It to the Vines

If potuto growers could only be led to realize that late potato blight or rot cannot be cured but can be prevented, they would use Bordeaux mixture more freely than they do. It is quite true that the late blight is not an annual visitor, nevertheless no one can prophesy when it will put in an unwelcome appearance. After it makes its presence visible by the leaves turning brown and drying up it is too late to save the crop, for fungicides are only preventives and not remedies. It does little if any good to apply them after the disease appears, and the spraying must be done before it can be known whether or not an outbreak will occur. Thus it is that if the blight does not appear the money spent in spraying appears to have been thrown away. Experiments not only in Canada but in the United States have demonstrated that spraying is profitable whether the late blight prevail or not. Though early blight is almost certain to appear unless prevented, and its damage, not so notideable in any one season, as that of the late blight, yet fully as great in the aggregate, may be almost wholly avoided by spraying. This disease causes the brown dead spots on the leaves, which are marked by concentric rings, and which sometimes affect so much of the leaf surface that the nutrition of the plant is seriously checked. For this disease, as for the late blight, Bordeaux mixture is an almost perfect preventive. Its protective power would probably be complete could each leaf be entirely coated with a thin layer of the deposited lime and copper sulphate, because the spores of the disease could then not find any vulnerable
