SHELTER FOR SWINE.

Nearly all farmers believe that their hogs do not need shelter while being fatted for market. If those who think this way and act at hough they believed it, would shelter where their hogs can get to it, they would at once have convincing proof that the hoge enjoy and appreciate protection this time of the year. A hog can be sheltered cheaper than any other animal on in Fre three the farm, says Mr. John M. Jami

On every farm on which hogs are grown there is enough fodder and struw wasted every winter to the hogs the most comfortable shelter. There are enough old rails and pieces of boards lying around loose make the framework for the needd shelter. In extremely cold weather it takes per cent. more feed to put a given gain on unsheltered hogs compared with those having comfortable shelter. I am not sure that extreme cold weather counts more against gain than extremely wet and muddy

A good many farmers make an attempt to | shelter their swine but too often it is a very poor one. So much so that it is labor and material lost, when a little more time and material would have made a success of the effort.

HOGS GET SORE THROAT. Last fall on my farm I was fe

53 hogs. When they came to full the epening, feed of corn in their lot, they were without shelter and I was planning ean in this to construct a frame of some kind that I could cover with bundled foddel, when there came a spell of very unpleasant weather. I noticed that some of them did not eat freely, but acted as though they had sore thuoats.

I could not take time then to build he fodder-covered shed. There was cholera within four miles of my farm and I could take no chances from exposure. To make the shelter certail on short notice I hauled into the lot six of my hog palaces or single brood sow houses. Four these are 7 feet and two 6 feet square. In these the 53 hogs now shelter very comfortably. When the weather is bad they all go into them. When it is pleasant some of then sleep outside, showing that they have a sense of what is comfortable. These houses will come it adjunces, use in a short time to shelter faror rowing sows Many farmers prefer 1910 to seil their straw or burn it rather, than allow their hogs to nest about I consider this a serious mistake.

If the straw is ricked or stacked, good shelter for feeding hogs can be made about it. Secure a dry bed out of the draft. If the hogs are dry, experience proves that there is no langer of getting them too hot. tor, It is impossible to measure the the fear that they would overheat in the liests. There is no danger if they are dry. But had results are certain if the shelter is not rainproof and the nest gets wet. Shelter should also be windproof, then there will be no tendency to pile up.
